At first he thought it was a Templar; the man was dressed in armour that certainly befitted the position, as it shone to a mirror finish, the sunlight glinting off the myriad angles. But, he noted the absence of a medal signifying such, and so placed him into the ranks of those warriors who wished to be a Templar but could not. His horse was a massive animal, possibly a draft horse. The attack came without warning as several masked men burst out of the woods, snarling and swinging weapons. Sisyphus reared, throwing Briareus off and bolting immediately. Xanthippe, on the other hand, let out a something akin to a banshees scream and began to stomp and kick with her massive hooves. Ekos, taken aback momentarily, recovered quickly and withdrew his sword, working in concert with his mount to dispatch the attackers. Briareus pulled himself off the ground; in his hand a small knife was held in a defensive position.
